It is often the case that, in matters of government, progress would (1) _____ prove impossible were it not for compromise. When a disagreement between members of different parties becomes insoluble, it is impossible to pass new laws and (2) _____ changes. The ability to compromise – to bring opposing (3) _____ together, with a deal that is agreeable to both – therefore serves a crucial purpose.

In 1787, the founding of the first United States government was already well (4) _____ when the negotiations hit a brick wall. The issue was representation, i.e. the number of officials each state should be allowed to elect to the government, a problem politicians had been arguing about for years and years. In this (5) _____ debate, some maintained that the number of politicians representing a certain state should depend on that state's population size, meaning that the more populous states would have more politicians to participate in the national government on their (6) _____. However, smaller states defended the (7) _____ of 'equal representation', according to which each member state should be entitled to the same number of government representatives, regardless of population size.

Fortunately, parties on either side of the divide eventually stopped arguing and reached a (8) _____, striking a deal that was so historic, and such a (9) _____ of the country's future success, that it is still referred to today as The Great Compromise. Thanks to this agreement, the US now has two branches of government: one based on equal representation, and the other based on representation according to population size.

Had it not been for The Great Compromise, the various states may not have been able to work together and (10) _____ in setting up the first United States government.
